

God Proven?
by Nishaun Smith

One of my main reasons for not believing in evolution is the fact that human intelligence is technically an energy source. Human intellectual capacity can be given a numerical value that would be a sum of the brain's capability. If I am right in this assumption then the question would be, how is evolution possible; how can a body with less (intellectual) energy create an object with more energy? The rules that govern energy prevent all forms of energy increase. (The rules like inertia, or equal opposite reaction, or the fact that energy can't be created or destroyed.)

My main argument is this...

A one-celled organism should not be able to create a human brain without the energy of a human mother. Nothing else in the universe is capable of self-regulated energy increase. So how come no scientist has explained what fuels evolution. It is true that cells can repeat themselves (repetition does not break any laws), but it may be impossible for an object to make itself evolve.

If my previous arguments are true then this would also mean that the human brain had to be created by an object with more intellectual capacity than itself. This may actually prove that God has to exist for mathematical reasons. We had to be created by something smarter with more energy than us. (Remember the brain can be classified as an energy source because of its capabilities.)

www.nishaun.com

www.about-god.org

Copyright © 2008 by Nishaun Smith

Feel free to copy do not alter or sell.